Excerpt: . . . these quotations are merely nominal, no sales having been made for a long time. Sometimes the quotations have reference to the occasional sale of a few shares, giving no knowledge of the probable selling price of the entire stock, or of a controlling interest, or even of any large block of shares. When sales are frequent the quotations are of greater importance, but it is often impossible to determine whether they represent a real value or are merely the result of the manipulations of financiers and speculators. Also the market value of stock is often based upon a hope, more or less well founded, of increased earnings at some future time. All of these and other circumstances must be taken into consideration, but the fundamental and final question which a bona fide purchaser must ask is, what is the earning capacity of the corporation, what is...
